An increase in biliary mass is a common finding in cirrhotic livers. Although histopathologic studies have revealed that bile ducts are hyperplastic, their characterization has never been made with serial histologic sections. In addition, the epithelial cell types, including whether bile duct epithelium undergoes proliferation, have never been studied. Liver biopsy specimens from 26 cirrhotic patients were studied to evaluate whether biliary epithelium proliferated. Liver was evaluated for both cholestasis, by the presence of Mallory bodies, and fibrosis. Because proliferative activity usually occurs with more extensive fibrosis, we excluded biopsy specimens that showed only cholestasis without fibrosis. Serial sections were then selected from each specimen and evaluated in a blind fashion. Biliary epithelial proliferation was categorized as periductal or intrahepatic, with the latter mainly reflecting hyperplastic bile ducts within portal spaces. Bile duct proliferation was present in 9 of 26 (35%) and was predominant in 5 of 13 (38%) biopsy specimens from patients with Child-Pugh class B cirrhosis. The occurrence of bile duct proliferation increased with an increase in the grade of portal fibrosis, and periductal or intrahepatic proliferation was more frequent than ductular reaction. When the biliary epithelium was hyperplastic, intrahepatic and periductal epithelium were of the same type. The proliferation of bile duct epithelium in cirrhotic livers is common.
